Mothering White Children
An African Canadian Woman's Experience

Engaged in cross-cultural education, including parent workshops to encourage white and high-achieving Black primary caregivers, this essay discusses one of the primary goals of Whose Culture Has Capital: to create a more equitable and inclusive learning environment. Using examples from the project, the author discusses the role of education in the socialization of children and the process of mothering in the home. This is an essential resource for anyone interested in the role of education in the socialization of children and the process of mothering in the home. It offers a unique perspective on the role of education in the socialization of children and the process of mothering in the home. It is a must-read for anyone interested in the role of education in the socialization of children and the process of mothering in the home.

Introduction

This article explores the experience of mothering as a form of power for the Canadian state. The discussion draws on the experiences and insights of mothers from various professional teaching backgrounds from a child welfare agency, teacher unions, and members of our local community. A response is offered to the question of the experience of Black mothering and the implications for the socialization of children and the process of mothering in the home. The article concludes by suggesting a more equitable approach to the work with racialized foster parents and addressing Black women's roles as mothers.

Offering children with nurturing and supportive environments is one of the most important roles of a foster family. White children are placed

Abstract: Chinese immigrants to China had a long history. However, due to the Chinese civil war and the 1949-1950s when millions of people fled to Hong Kong and Taiwan, the first wave of Chinese immigrants to Canada was primarily composed of political refugees. In the 1970s, the second wave of Chinese immigrants to Canada was primarily composed of students, business professionals, and skilled workers. This article examines the experience of youth growing up in Chinese immigrant families within the Canadian context. It explores the implications of the experience of youth growing up in Chinese immigrant families within the Canadian context. Introduction

Chinese immigrants came to Canada as early as in the late 1800s to work for gold fields in the Fraser Valley of British Columbia. Today, according to the 2010 Census, over 1.2 million Chinese individuals are now residing in Canada under various "status" (the most recent group is the recent immigrant group in Canada Statistics Canada, 2010). During the last two and a

"I am the language I speak Chinese. Your vision, Your words, You direct me not" (Queen 14) says the Mother to her children in Betty Queen's play Mother Tongue Motherhood, the central theme of mothering is with the language of mothering, as is the way in which the child/child's identity, the sense of self and cultural subjectivity is formed and negotiated. This chapter explores the language of mothering through two historical accounts of language mothering both of which address the mother/Chinese mothering practices and linguistic differences. First to address Ann's work by regarding that to the context of migration, the language of mothering can be conceptualized as a mothering and raising practice, which functions as a connecting, creative force that produces and shapes both mother and child's subjectivity. This chapter will consider two historical texts: the play Mother Tongue (1996) by Chinese Canadian playwright Betty Queen and the novel Queen of Motherhood (1998) by Japanese Canadian author Helen Otsi, both tracing immigrant and refugee mothers who mother primarily in their own mother tongue rather than English, the language of the host country, Canada.
Both Queen and Otsi are award-winning authors, Queen is playwright writing for stage, film and television as well as a child's author, whereas Otsi is primarily a novelist who also writes for young adults. They both make conscious use of Chinese and Japanese idioms respectively in their work and explore issues of identity, culture, language, racial/ethnic difference and the generation gap. One has to be careful not to
